

So I started obviously in the pre-rules day, when these were basically cash economies. We spent enormous amounts of money. Sometimes it was checks, but they would, there were no rules, there was nothing wrong with it. And, if you were running a particular you might get a, you know, paper bag full of cash to use, we used to call it walking around money, but that was to kind of pay the people who would go on Election Day and go try to turn out the vote and a variety of things. Actually, not, it wasn't, it wasn't particularly insidious, you could, you paid someone to spend their day doing quote-unquote "volunteer activity."
